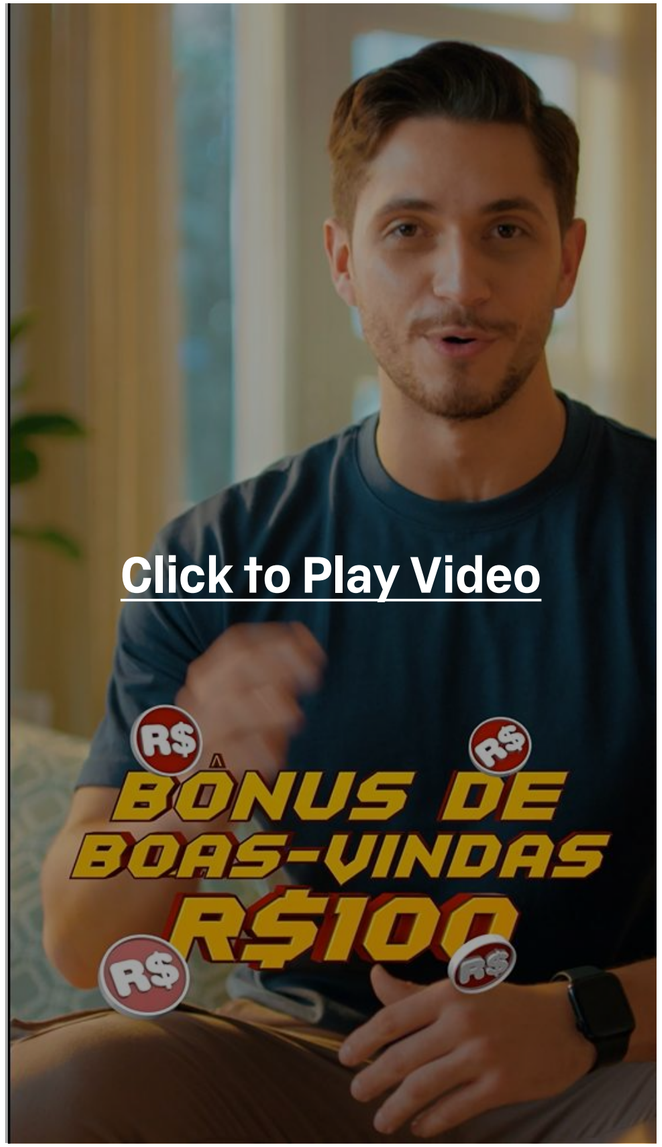
MPL MOBILE PREMIER LEAGUE



Background

Global Mobile Gaming Platform

Mobile Premier League (MPL) is a global mobile gaming platform offering users skill-based tournaments with real cash rewards. While launching in Brazil, we observed that localization was not merely about language, and we had to factor in emotion, familiarity, and cultural connection.

Objective

Driving Growth via Cultural Relevance

The goal was to boost performance by localizing creatives that resonated with the Brazilian audience. Rather than relying on basic translations, the aim was to create human-centric, culturally rooted Portuguese content that built trust and relatability to deepen emotional connection and to improve campaign efficiency while supporting larger budget scaling across channels.

Challenge

Breaking Through the Trust Barrier

The initial campaign creatives lacked a sense of local authenticity. Stock imagery and generic messaging failed to connect with Brazilian users on a cultural level. Additionally, Real Money Gaming (RMG) was still a relatively new category in Brazil, creating a trust barrier that required more culturally nuanced reassurance.

Our Approach

To break through creative fatigue and build deeper connections, we shifted our focus from showcasing gameplay and product UI to spotlighting the human experience. Instead of leading with features, we leaned into emotions, crafting narratives around real people, their reactions, and the cultural nuances that make Brazil unique.

This creative transformation was anchored in authenticity. We introduced human-led storytelling featuring Brazilian faces, familiar slang, and region-specific tonality. By reflecting local humor and highlighting culturally loved games like Truco, we made every ad feel like it was made for Brazil and was not just a mere translation into Portuguese.

Every creative asset was tested and adapted for hyperlocal relevance. From voiceovers to subtitles to CTAs, each element was fine-tuned to align with Brazilian language and sensibilities. We focused on trust, fun, and the feeling of reward, values that matter to users, rather than simply pushing product features.

This approach was backed by data. Through rigorous A/B testing of human-led versus product-only creatives, we identified high-performing formats and scaled them across major channels including Google, Meta, Applovin, and Mintegral. The new strategy launched in Q1 2025 during the campaign's scaling phase, ensuring impact at both the emotional and performance level.

The Result

The localized, human-centric creative approach delivered a clear uplift in performance and efficiency across the board. As budgets scaled, so did impact, proving that cultural resonance drives results.
